Re: Consumer Protections for Overseas Remittances

Dear Members of Congress:

The undersigned representatives of remittance senders – mostly low and moderate income recent immigrants to the U.S. – write to support the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau’s (CFPB’s) recent remittance rule.1 This rule, solidly based on the statutory language passed by Congress in 2010, requires remittance transfer providers to provide essential information to consumers about the actual amount of money to be received by their family in the foreign country. The rule makes remittance providers liable for agents acting on their behalf and includes an error resolution procedure to resolve problems.

The remittance transfer regulation – and its underlying statute – ensure for the first time transparency and fairness in remittance transactions. The rules are simple, easy to comply with, and an essential tool for remittance senders to be able to understand the actual terms of the transaction. The error resolution procedure mirrors the long-established and workable one already in the Electronic Fund Transfer Act – there is little actually new in these rules.

Many financial institutions have expressed concerns with the requirement that the remittance provider disclose the exact amount to be received by the recipient, as this requires the provider to know the amount of charges imposed by the agent in the foreign country. Because of this concern, both the statute and the CFPB’s rule allow financial institutions – for five years from enactment – to provide estimates rather than fixed amounts. This time window provides these financial institutions time to comply, so that their remittance services will be as reliable and as competitive as others offered in this market. The statute provides that the CFPB may permit financial institutions more time if the five years prove to be unworkable.

Congress provided banks and credit unions with five years to comply. Surely, this is long enough. If they choose to stop providing remittance transfer services, there is no evidence that consumers will then be left without remittance service providers. In our free market economy, alternative providers at competitive prices will inevitably arise; indeed, many corridors are quite dynamic now, with new offerings from “mobile money” providers.

Consumers deserve bank and credit union compliance with the rule in the time frames contemplated by Congress. Additional consumer protections have been in the works for years, long before the adoption of Section 1073 of Dodd Frank. Since its enactment in 2010, banks and credit unions have been in a position to prepare for its implementation. If some have elected to delay compliance, their inaction should not be rewarded by additional accommodations.

We believe that most banks, credit unions and remittance transfer providers will find a way not only to comply with the rule on time, but also to embrace the transparency and accountability to their customers without complaint. Indeed the most progressive and competitive financial institutions will value the predictability and fair dealing compliance with the rule provides.

We hope that you will join us in opposing any delays or reductions in protections provided for remittance transactions.
