WASHINGTON – On Thursday, the Consumer Data Industry Association (CDIA) sued the State of New Jersey over its new law requiring credit reports to be provided in Spanish and 10 other languages, claiming the law is preempted and a violation of the First Amendment. CDIA is a trade association for the credit reporting industry, the biggest players in which are Equifax, Experian and TransUnion. Consumer and civil rights advocates expressed outrage at the credit bureaus’ lawsuit.

“Nearly 26 million people in this country are limited English proficient,” noted Chi Chi Wu, staff attorney at the National Consumer Law Center. “Not only have the credit bureaus abysmally failed to serve them on a national level by providing credit reports in other languages, but now they are actively suing to invalidate New Jersey’s language access law. I’d expect this type of reaction from anti-immigrant groups, not multinational corporations.”

The credit bureaus’ actions are especially egregious given that the Department of Homeland Security’s newly adopted public charge rule requires consideration of an immigrant’s credit report and score (implementation of the public charge rule is on hold as a result of several preliminary court decisions, but the litigation is at the very early stages).

“The credit bureaus’ lawsuit makes it that much harder for immigrants if the public charge rule becomes effective,” explained Jennifer Brown, associate director of Economic Policy at UnidosUS. “Instead of helping immigrants by providing translated credit reports, the credit bureaus have joined the forces that seek to make immigrants’ lives worse.”

Seema Agnani, executive director of the National Coalition for Asian Pacific Americans Community Development stated, “Immigrants are the fastest growing population in many states, and our communities are engines of economic growth. The credit bureaus’ unreasonable refusal to take the simple step of providing translated credit reports to help that economic growth is bad enough, but actively suing so they aren’t required to provide translated credit reports is shameful.”

The credit bureaus’ lawsuit against New Jersey follows on the heels of a similar one against the State of Maine that seeks to protect domestic violence victims and consumers with medical debt. “The states have always filled in the gaps in federal consumer laws,” said Ed Mierzwinski, senior director for consumer programs at U.S. PIRG. “Their latest lawsuits show that the credit bureaus not only don’t care about state consumer protections, but don’t care about helping consumers at all, especially vulnerable groups like immigrants, domestic violence survivors and even medical debt victims.”
